How to Ask Your Patients for Feedback Without Fear

Introduction

Online patient reviews are the beating heart of your practice's digital marketing strategy. 94% of patients use them to evaluate healthcare practices[1], making them the easiest way to keep your schedule full without extra effort.

A strong collection of raving reviews will build trust with potential patients, making them excited to book your services. These fill-in-the-blank templates help you simplify the request process to grow your online reputation.

Benefits of Asking for Reviews

Most patients are happy to leave their doctor a review, especially if they can do it online. Like you, they recognize that this is a form of supporting your practice.

But how exactly does it help? A good online review can:

Attract New Patients

- New reviews show potential patients you are well-regarded by your patients and your services are highly sought after.

Increase Trust

- Honest reviews from your patients show transparency and build trust with potential patients who value their community's opinion.

Improve Online Visibility

- More reviews boost your profile in search results, making your practice easier to find by patients searching online.

Tip for Asking for Reviews

Done right, review requests should make your patients excited to leave you feedback. Here are some tips to remember.

Timing is key.
Patients should review your practice while their experience is fresh in mind and they still feel motivated to do so. Try to request reviews shortly after their appointment. You can make this easy by using an automated review request tool like WebMD's Reputation Management.

Make it simple.
If leaving a review is too complicated, patients won't waste time figuring it out. You should provide a direct link to the review site. With WebMD, patients can leave reviews directly on your profile and they'll automatically post across review sites.

Keep it personal.
You should always tailor your review request using the patient's name and visit details. This will make them feel like they're not just getting a mass request and will be more likely to leave a review. WebMD's automation features enable you to personalize messages without having to do it manually.

Handling Unclear or Mixed Experiences

You can't always be certain if a patient had a good experience with your practice. The good news is, there are ways to test the waters before they leave a bad review.

Encourage Private Feedback First

You can request feedback privately before asking for a review. This helps your practice address concerns early and turn a potential negative review into a positive one. Here's a template you can use:

> Hi [Patient's First Name],
>
> It was great to see you!
>
> We just wanted to quickly ask you how your experience was with us. We value your feedback, so if you have any questions or concerns, please let us know here: [link to form].
>
> Thank you so much and have a great rest of your day!
>
> Warm regards,
> [Practice Name]

Try the Personalized, Open-Ended Approach

In your request, you can ask for honest feedback without assuming the experience was negative or positive. Try something like this:

> Hi [Patient's First Name],
>
> Thank you for choosing our practice for your recent visit!
>
> We'd love to learn more about your experience. Whatever you have to share, we're here to listen. Would you mind leaving us a quick review here [link to review site]?
>
> Thank you so much, we can't wait to hear your thoughts!
>
> Warm regards,
> [Practice Name]

Key Considerations

Requesting patient reviews is a delicate balance. Although you should send review requests shortly after a patient's visit, you should also respect their timing.

Some patients need time to reflect on their experience, so avoid pressuring them once a request is sent. If you want to send a reminder, it should be 5-7 days after their visit[2].

Remember:
Don't ever force your patients to leave feedback. There should be a clear option for them to decline.

What Happens if I Get a Negative Review?

Don't panic if your practice gets a negative review. They happen and they're actually quite common. However, you shouldn't ignore them.

A bad review can leave patients questioning your quality of care. It's important to respond to them quickly. By doing this, you can reassure both the reviewer and potential patients that improving is important to you. If you need some ideas on how to respond to negative reviews, check out our free fill-in-the-blank review response templates.

It can be hard to find and respond to all of your reviews, but a good reputation management tool can automate the entire process. Here's more info on how you can easily manage your reviews.

Conclusion

Asking your patients to leave reviews can quickly build your online reputation and help you book more patients than ever. With the right strategy, it doesn't have to be awkward or time consuming for patients or your staff.
